Local children's writer visits Rose Road!

Lynsey Davis, writer of Max went to the New Forest kindly came along to Rose Road to read her brilliant book to the young disabled people that attended the Bradbury playscheme. Rose Road supports local children and young adults with disabilities through a range of short break services. One of these services is playscheme which runs throughout the year during the school holidays with a wide range of free flow play, structured activities and trips in a safe and caring environment.

Lynsey Davis, from Brockenhurst, moved from New Zealand three years ago, and was so taken with the animals her son Max will grow up with that she wanted to create something special. Joining forces with friend and local artist Bobby Sephton, the duo wrote & illustrated their very own tactile children's book. The board book has a touchy-feely section on each page, along with brightly coloured, hand-painted pictures of local animals, a story, and interesting facts about the New Forest.

The children at Rose Road listened intently to Lynsey and were able to touch and feel the book and particularly enjoyed the sticky mud part!

Lynsey comments "It was great to see the children engage with the book and learn about a local attraction."

The book is available online via their website, Lymington Waterstones, as well as in local visitor attractions, tourist information centres and shops in Brockenhurst. It's also stocked in Lulubelle's Tearooms in Canford Cliffs, Dorset.
